WHAT IS FACTORING

The factoring is an agreement by which the factoring company purchases and/or manages trade receivables, claimed by the assignor against a predetermined pool of debtors, with the possibility to obtain the advance, in whole or in part, of the consideration for the same receivables, or to obtain the assumption of the risk of failed-payment due at contractual maturities.

The non-recourse Maturity Factoring

Factoring transaction where the factoring company assumes the risk of failed-payment by assigned debtors at contractual maturities.

The purchase of receivables is communicated to assigned debtors; the assignor and the factoring company may agree not to communicate the assignment to assigned debtors.

By using this service the assignor may reduce the internal management costs of its trade receivables, obtain from the factoring company the warranty of the payment at the scheduled maturity and have the availability of a source of funding.

Risks on the side of the client

The client warrants the existence of the assigned receivables, the properness of the supply as well as of the award of tenders; the completeness of every supporting evidence, concerning the entire assigned receivable; the inexistence of claims by the debtor and/or third parties against the client which could be set-off, even partially, against the assigned receivables.

The forfeiture cases of the warranty given by the factor are identified in the agreement and trigger the obligation on the side of the client to repurchase the assigned receivables.
